Questioning

by B.F.

Everyone Questions Their Sexual Identity

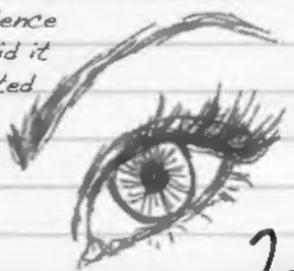

It is a natural process: everyone reaches a point in their life where they question their sexual orientation. It's perfectly normal, and figuring out if you're gay or straight is a process. Sexual orientation is an important part of human sexuality. We're all attracted to others. However, there is a lack of resources that can make the process a little difficult, as well as misleading information and fear concerning homosexuals. The result is devastating social, personal and institutional discrimination, and even violence.

One of the most commonly asked questions about homosexuality is, "How do you know if you're gay?" The truth is that these experiences are a normal expression of curiosity and a source of learning about the body and sexuality. Many people have had these kinds of experiences and enjoyed them, but that does not necessarily mean you're gay. People who are actually gay often have some indication of this from an early age. They may feel quite different from other people. This can be very confusing and stressful, and is often understood only after a great deal of personal struggle.

Sometimes the process of questioning can be aided when you ask yourself some of the following questions: Who do I usually have crushes on? Is it mainly someone of the same gender? Do I imagine relationships with someone of the same gender? If I dated or had a sexual experience with someone of the same gender, how did it make me feel? Do I feel strongly attracted to people of both genders? Do I think I could have a sexual or romantic relationship with either males or females?

You are NOT Alone!

Defining Sexuality

by S.W.

Though labels can sometimes be constricting, defining your sexual orientation can be a useful way of understanding both your own identity and the identities of others. The next two pages are dedicated to describing the definitions of several possible sexual orientations, as well as common terms that are often heard within those communities.

You may immediately relate to one of these definitions, or feel like you might be several of them all at once. Maybe none of them seem quite right. And what you may define yourself as today might not be what you define yourself as tomorrow--sexuality is fluid and often unpredictable. Even if the answers aren't immediately clear to you, you can still empower yourself by understanding the language of queer community.

Can you guess their sexual orientation?
... Sorry, you're wrong.

LGBTQ

Stands for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Intersex, Transgender, and Queer; aka, the gay or queer community.

Sex vs. Gender

Sex is generally understood to refer to a person's biological sex, which we determine by looking at chromosomes or genitals. Gender is used to refer to the meanings we attach to people based on their biological sex; for example, we often expect that women will act emotional, or that men will be better at math and science. These expectations have been proven false, but they persist in our culture because many people still believe that a person's biology will determine their personality or behavior.

The term "gender binary" refers to the fact that Western culture only recognizes two possible genders: male and female. Though these are certainly the most common, they are not the only possible genders.

Gay

A man who is sexually and romantically attracted to other men exclusively. Though the word "gay" can be used synonymously with "homosexual," most people prefer "gay" as it is less clinical-sounding. Sometimes all LGBTQ people are referred to as the "gay community". Women can also use the word "gay" to describe their same-sex desire.

Lesbian

A woman who is sexually and romantically attracted to other women exclusively.

Bisexual

LOVE

A person who is sexually and romantically attracted to both men and women. Some bisexuals may always prefer one sex over the other, while the sex preferences of other bisexuals fluctuate over time.

A popular misconception is that bisexuals are incapable of monogamy, or need to have relationships with both men and women at the same time; this is not true. Bisexuals are just as capable of monogamy as any other person. The bisexual community commonly expresses sentiments of not feeling fully accepted by either straight or gay culture.

Straight

A straight person is sexually and romantically attracted to people of the opposite sex. Heterosexuality is assumed to be "normal" in Western culture, and those who do not live heterosexual lifestyles (such as members of the LGBITQ community) are often rejecting this "heteronormativity."

Transgender

A person who does not feel that they conform to the gender roles attached to their biological sex. This is a very subjective word that can be used to encompass people who may also be labeled as androgynous, genderqueer, or transsexual.

Transsexual

A person who does not wish to live as the biological sex they were born as. Though some may choose to pursue a sex reassignment surgery or take hormone replacements (both of which change physical sex characteristics), many are content simply to "pass" as the sex they wish to be. Transsexuality does not indicate any particular sexual orientation; a transsexual person may any one of the other sexual identities we've discussed.

Intersex

A person whose sex characteristics are not definitively male or female, either in sex chromosomes, genitalia, or secondary sex characteristics (breasts, muscle mass, etc.). Historically, many intersexuals were referred to as "hermaphrodites," though the term is considered to be somewhat derogatory outside of medical terminology. Because their biological sex cannot be easily determined, many intersexuals consider themselves to be transgender as well.

Queer

This term can refer to several different things. It is often used as an umbrella term to summarize the LGBITQ acronym as the "queer community"; in this usage, it sometimes also includes straight people who participate in non-mainstream sexual activities (like BDSM). As a sexual orientation, it describes a person's attraction to people of all sex and gender identities, including intersexuals and the genderqueer (sometimes also called pansexuality). It has political connotations due to the fact that it renounces the limiting nature of existing gender and sexual identities.

Other Terms

Androgynous: A person who has performative and personality traits of both sexes.

Asexual: A person who experiences no sexual attraction; however, some may feel romantic attractions towards others.

Genderqueer: A person who may think of themselves as being both male and female, neither male or female, or reject the concept of gender altogether. Some may choose to physically alter their bodies like transsexuals do.

Polyamory: The practice of having multiple relationships at once, with the consent and awareness of all partners.

Transman/FtM: A person who was born as a woman, but now lives as a man.

Transwomen/Mtf: A person who was born as a man, but now lives as a woman.

How to Deal: Approaches to Queer Sexuality

by V.V.S.

Before you "come out" to your friends and family you need to know what it means to be homosexual. Not what it means to you, but what it means to the world when you call yourself gay, lesbian, bisexual, or queer. One of the main problems with queer people coming out is that many of them feel guilt for the way they feel. When you are a child society tells you that queer people are sick, that there is something wrong with them, or that they are abnormal. In order to live a happy life as a queer person you need to first understand that there is nothing wrong with you. Many people will try to tell you why queer people are queer, one example of this is when people say that the reason a woman is a lesbian is because she didn't have a strong father figure in her life, or that a man is gay because his mother spent too much time coddling him as a child, and no one ever "toughened" him up. There is also the argument that to be queer is to have some sort of "gay gene" that decides for you, before you are even born that you will be gay. Both of these theories have been tested for years, it's a debate in the medical and psychological world, is it nature or nurture?

You may ask why is it important for people to figure out what makes you queer?

The Biological Approach

Many people feel like it would make the fight for gay rights easier if we could prove that people are born gay. Many people believe that if we can put sexual orientation into the same category as race, then it would become a civil rights issue, not a lifestyle choice issue. This would make it easier to advocate for equal rights using the argument "You can't blame us for the way we were born", but this isn't the best way to approach the issue for most people. There have been countless studies trying to find the gay gene. This began back in World War II when the Nazi regime began to do studies on gay people to figure out what makes them gay. Even today there are studies on rams said to be gay, with the intent of finding out what makes them gay. There was an article in The Seattle Times that claimed "The Corvallis herd includes a group of rams that scientists delicately refer to 'male-oriented'" (The Seattle Times June 2005) They claim that the ram's sexual orientation is hard wired into their brains at birth. The problem here is the thought that if you can isolate what makes someone gay, then you can remove it and "cure" them. The idea that there is something inherently wrong with gay people is one that fuels the idea of biology determining whether someone is gay or straight.

The largest group of people left out by this are bisexuals. If someone is bisexual then they are not born queer, or born straight, rather they choose who they are going to have relationships on other criteria. This immediately breaks down the association between genes and homosexuality.

The Nurture Approach

The dominant belief is what makes someone gay is how they were raised as a child. This comes from many psychological studies that "proved" homosexuality was a mental disorder. This view also comes from the idea that to be queer is to have something wrong with you, and instead of it being a biological problem, it is rather a mental disorder. Freud was a loud voice on this subject documenting many reasons for homosexuality, including "overprotective mothers and distant fathers helped make boys gay" (The Boston Globe August 2005). Only in 1973 did the American Psychiatric Association remove homosexuality from its list of mental disorders (The Boston Globe, August 2005).

The main idea here is whether you feel like you were born gay, or you were raised that way, or whether you chose that as a type of lifestyle it is all the same. Sexual orientation is given to much credit in our society. People have been queer since the world began, it only became a "problem" in recent years. There is nothing wrong with you! Being gay doesn't mean you are unhealthy, or bad person, it means that you have made this decision for yourself that allows you to live the type of life you want to live, and nothing more.

The May-be-Gay Maze

can you find your way out of the gender binary and discover your ideal partner?

By S.W.

Coming Out

by V.S.

Here are some pointers that you might find helpful when telling people about your sexual orientation, or "coming out."

1. Make sure YOU are ready!

You don't have to settle on an orientation to come out to people, because revealing your orientation is a process that you will experience your entire life whether or not you are a heterosexual or L.G.B.I.T.Q. identified.

So if you are not 100% ready, don't do it. Make sure it's on your terms. Also if you feel you don't want to make a big deal of coming out, then live your life day to day, you do not need to hide yourself nor do you need to publicly tell everyone, they can figure it out or ask if they need to.

2. You don't need to have a speech prepared and it does not have to be declarative. It can be as simple as "I like people of the same gender," but it does not have to block you in for life. Sexuality can be fluid, so you are not stuck. It's just an identity and people change identities every day.

3. Be Prepared! Whether you get a good response, a bad response or an "I already know" response, just make sure that you mentally prepare yourself to be ready for any response. Some may judge you, but as long as YOU know that you are not doing anything wrong, then those who you come out to will see it too, even if not at first--after all you are the same person. Take into consideration the community to which you are coming out to. Do they have homophobic tendencies? If so, try to think of the safest way of coming out.

4. Try to tell someone who you know will be positive first, that way they can help you through the process. Think of the best way to come out, whether it be a face to face conversation or what have you. In addition, it's best to start small with people who you really know, that way you can build confidence as you go along your path.

5. In readiness for a bad response here are a few more tips: if you are in a moving vehicle make sure that you are driving, also have some resources ready for you and the person you are telling (i.e. hotlines, counselors, PFLAG, etc.)

6. BE PROUD! Even if you are having a hard time coming out, or those who you came out to are having a hard time dealing with it or understanding it, what you are doing takes a lot of strength and courage.

I'm coming out... I want the world to know, got to let it show!

SAME-Sex SAFE Sex by S.W.

- Sex between men should always include the use of condoms, whether you are participating in oral or anal sex. Condoms prevent the spread of HIV/AIDS, as well as many STDs.
- Familiarize yourself with the proper way to use condoms. While you're by yourself, practice putting on condoms quickly until it becomes second nature to do so. You can even try tearing one while you're wearing it--this way, you'll recognize the feeling and know if something goes wrong.
- When participating in anal sex, use lots and lots of water-based lube (such as KY Jelly). This reduces the risk of tearing, bleeding, and condom breakage. Never use ultra-thin condoms designed for vaginal sex, as anal sex is rougher and requires stronger, thicker condoms.

Choosing to have same-sex sex may eliminate the possibility of pregnancy, but it doesn't eliminate risk altogether. No matter who you are having sex with, it is important to take precautions to prevent the spread of sexually transmitted diseases. Here are some tips that will help you stay healthy while having fun.

- Various strains of the HPV virus, commonly called herpes, can be spread between the mouth, vagina, penis, and anus, whether or not any visible sores are present at the time. Condoms and dental dams (a latex sheet spread over areas of contact) can prevent the spread of herpes and other STDs.
- Over 17 million women have HIV/AIDS worldwide--and this statistic includes lesbians. Vaginal-to-vaginal contact, finger-to-vaginal contact, or finger-to-anal contact should always be used with barriers such as dental dams, condoms, or latex gloves.
- Sex toys can also be used to inadvertently spread bacteria and infections, particularly if they are porous. When buying sex toys, choose those that are made of materials like silicone and glass, while avoiding jelly toys. Clean your personal toys regularly. Put condoms on sex toys that you share with partners, and be sure to change the condom between partners.

GAY? STRAIGHT? BI?
NOT SURE?

It's okay. We didn't always know either.

Lots of people find themselves questioning their sexual identity at some point, especially as teenagers. But even if you're sure about your orientation, this booklet will have something to teach you. This booklet will also help you understand what LGBTQ culture means. So sit back, open up your mind, and get ready to learn something new.
